4, BONN'S DEFENSE BUDGET INDICATES REARMAMENT SLOWER THAN PLANNED

25X1A

Despite Chancellor Adenauer's recent public statement in support of rapid rearmament, the position of his government on defense expenditures makes it appear that the prospective build-up will be slow, according to Ambassador Conant. On 28 September the Bonn Foreign Ministry notified the American embassy that the government intends to spend approximately 2.3 billion dollars annually on the new army and that this sum will probably not be increased until after the 1957 federal elections.

Conant observes that such a program would leave a large gap between Bonn's total defense bill and the outlays necessary for the planned three-year build-up.

Comment

Discussions on the rate and magnitude of German rearmament are now being held in Bonn and in Paris in connection with the NATO annual review. Bonn's Defense Ministry, with Adenauer's ostensible support, strongly advocates a three-year build-up. The chancellor, however, has not opposed the actions of the Finance Ministry, which is intent on stretching out the build-up period to five or six years so as to keep defense expenditures low.

Bonn's contemplated expenditures are less proportionately than the defense expenditures of other major NATO countries.
